

Blooming the Codes
Dieter Telfser 2005

Formic acid (systematically called methanoic acid) is the simplest carboxylic acid. Its formula is CH_2O_2 or HCOOH . Its structure is shown at right.

In nature, it is found in the stings and bites of many insects of the order Hymenoptera, including bees and ants. It is also the principal irritant in the leaves of the stinging nettle. Its name come from the Latin word for ant, formica, referring to its early isolation by the distillation of ant bodies.

Blooming
Methan
Javas
Codability:

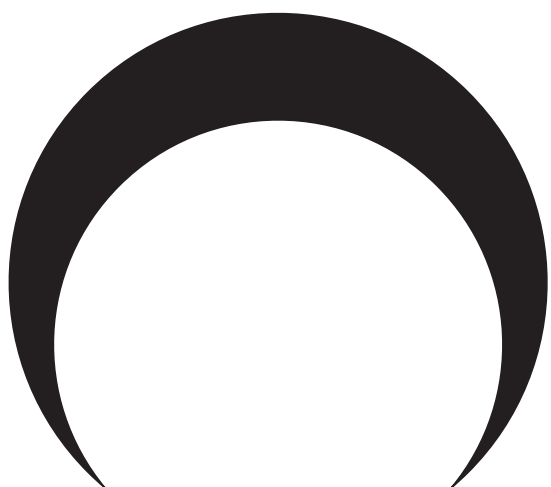

Preliminaries:

They never would build
their homes round.

A Village for Anties

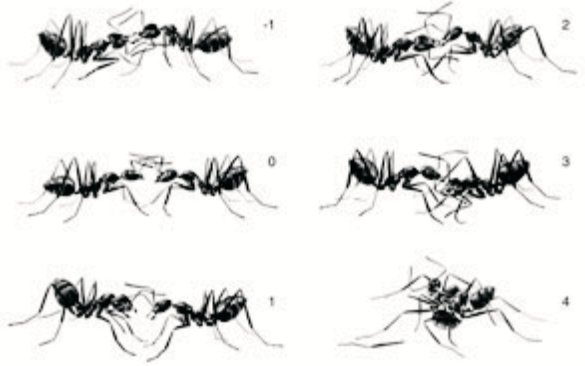

Anties for their skills.

Blooming Metas:

Preliminaries:

No ant ever had the time to think about Identities.
Basically they are thrilled by reality!

Floreal Globalities...
Who ever wanted the shapes without tastities?

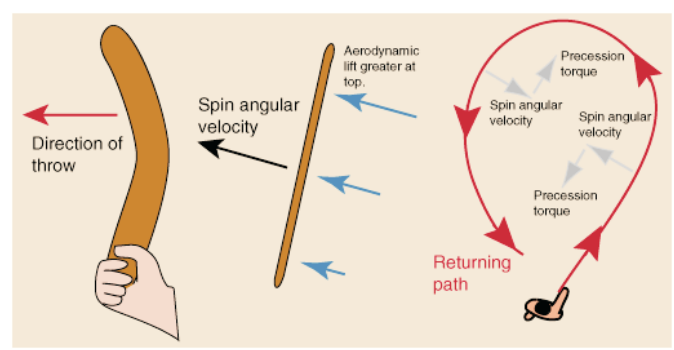

Obviosely Sharpness Matters! But it can not be reduced to a sign.
No Corprate Thought ever was capable to activate humility.

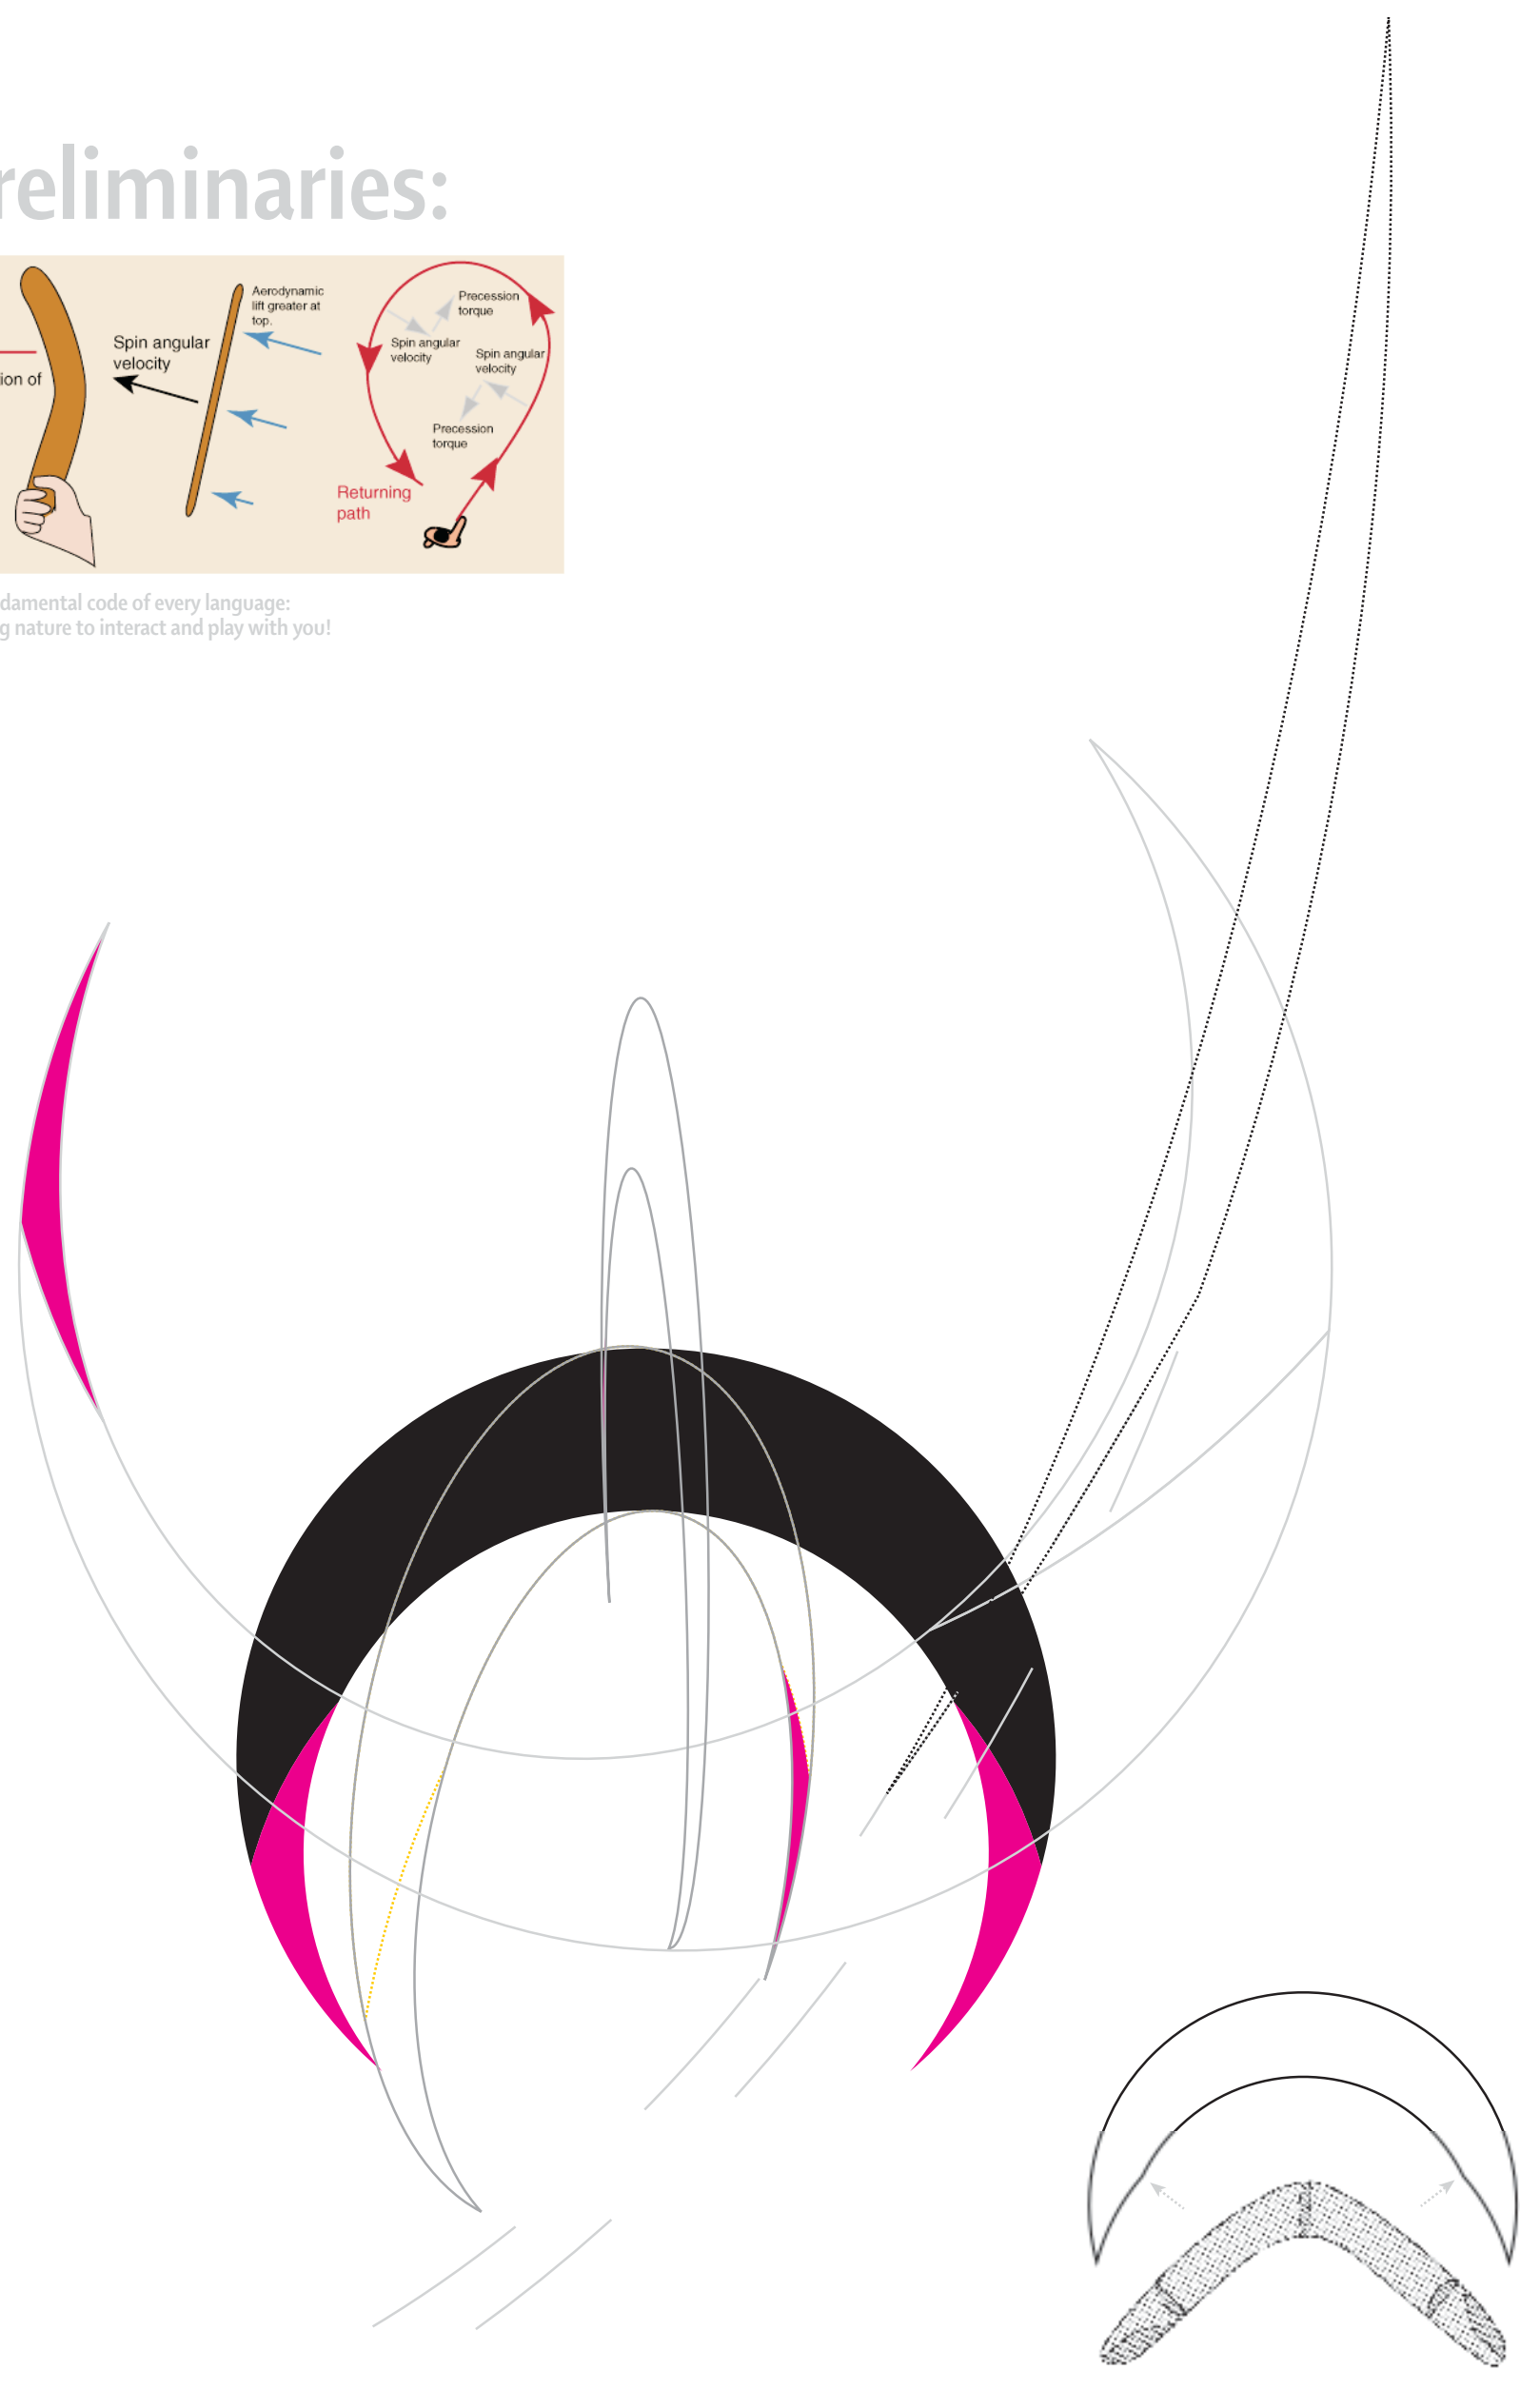

Aua! Some things hurt!
Better stand alone sharing the skills! Is it you?

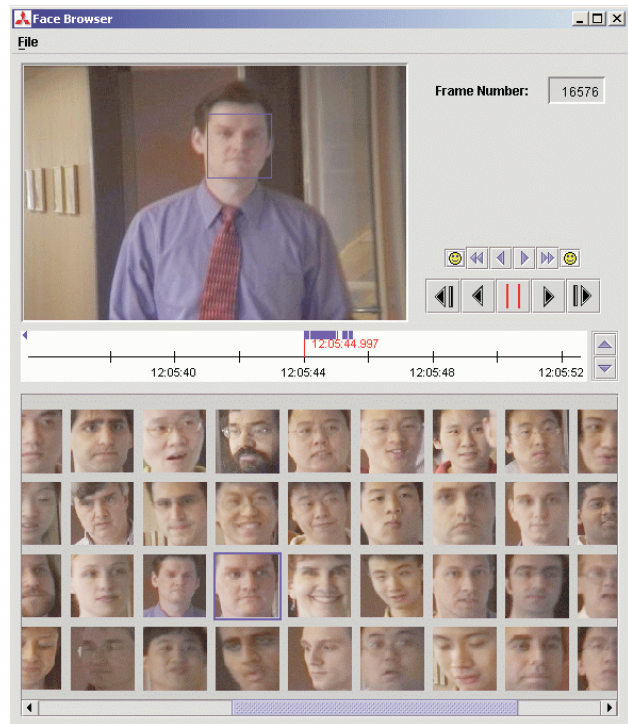

Preliminaries:

The fundamental code of every language:
Enabling nature to interact and play with you!

Preliminaries:

Every thought has its face!

Here is the most stupid example of abusing identities: Face Based Browsing for Surveillance Applications.

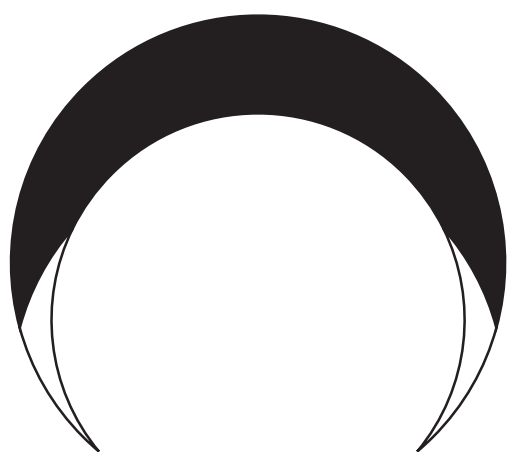

Traditional Branding is based on penetrating loop-focalized differenced Uniqueness.

Developing face codes for the Antville Language is criminal, but still a visual reality.

The Codes:

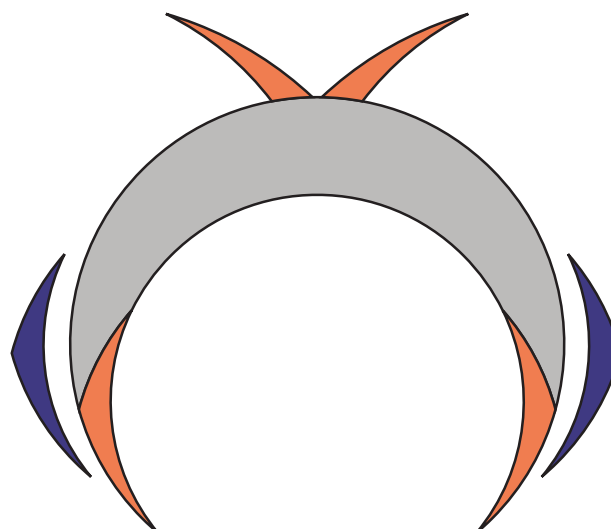

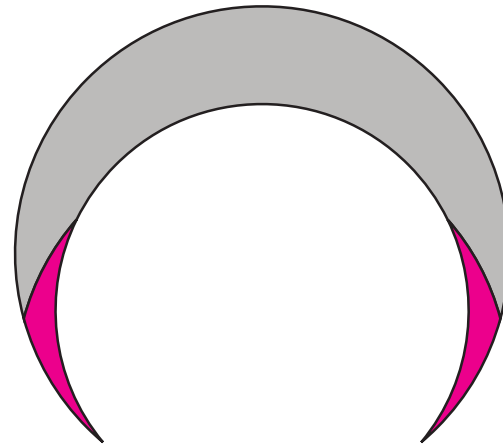

<(Ä)>

The Moods:

No Rules. A person's mood is a measurable state, which can consist of a combination of Emotions. In normal »functioning«, moods are largely influenced by external events.

The Brand:

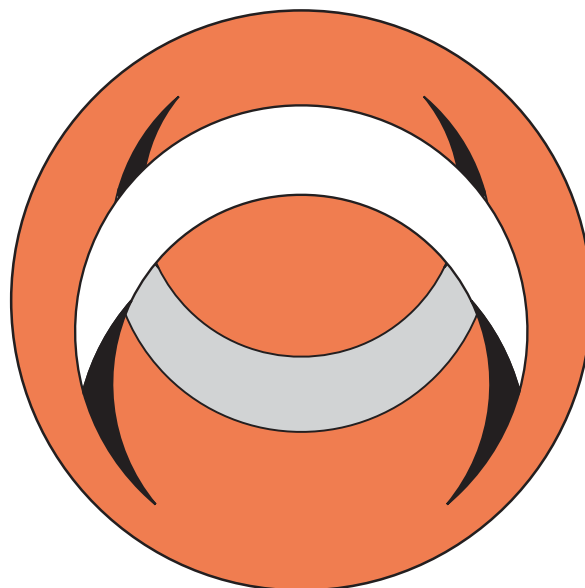

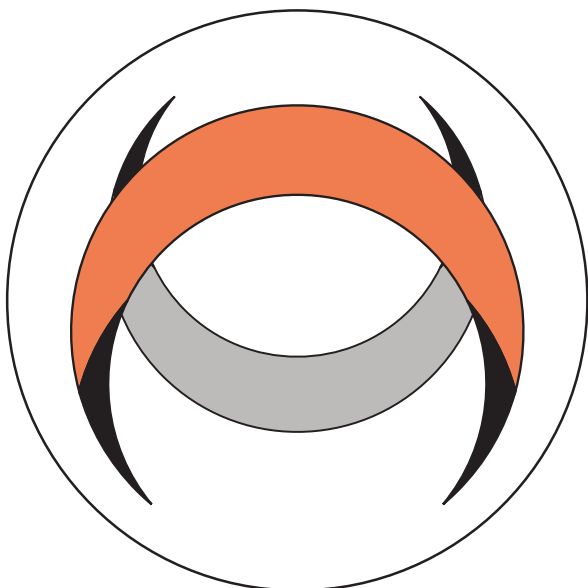

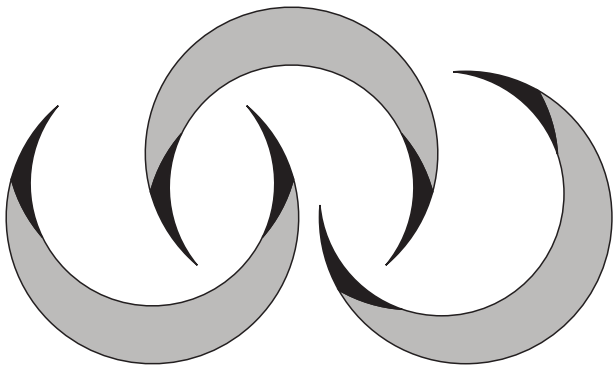

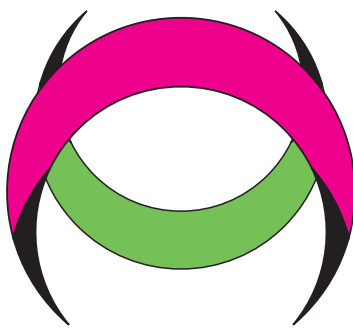

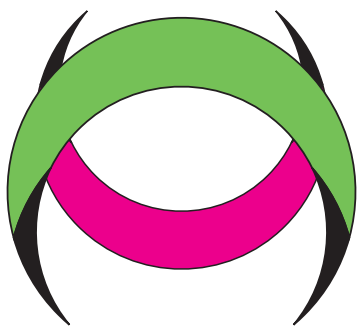

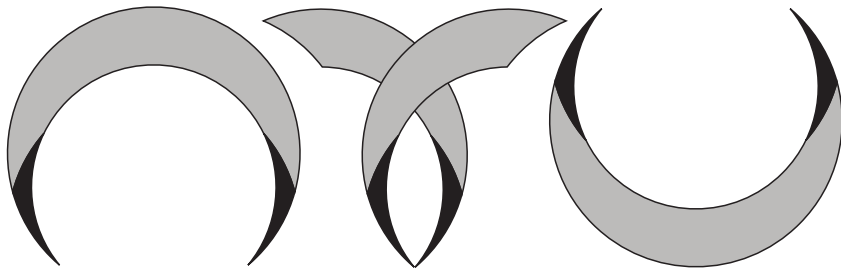

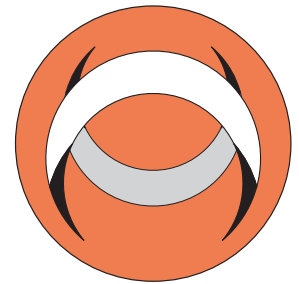

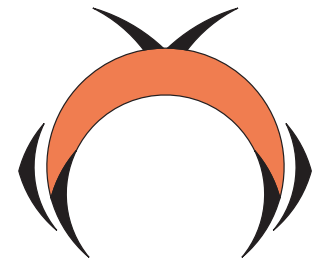

Atypical Briefs:

Made with Antville:

We don't need a face to type, do we?

Links happen!

Blooming Metas:

Is it Code?

